User Reviews.Q: Is there any event in Android that tells when a device gets out of range of WLAN? I have seen a lot of people who want their apps to know when a device is out of range of WLAN. And I am wondering if there is any event like "Device got out of range of WLAN". I have searched a lot and found some devices that have such kind of event. Does anyone know the reason for doing so and also if it is possible to develop such kind of application in Android. A: There is "device out of range" event fired when device is out of range of some wireless access point (AP). It is fired when access point is out of range, assuming that device is connected to this access point. More information about Bluetooth API can be found here. I am not sure if this event is fired for all access points that device is connected to, or you are interested in specific access points only.
